Session

Junior Sociologists meet Senior Sociologists

Lundberg, Janna

2014

Document Version:
Manuskriptversion, referentgranskad och korrigerad (även kallat post-print)

Link to publication

Citation for published version (APA):

General rights
Copyright and moral rights for the publications made accessible in the public portal are retained by the authors and/or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

• Users may download and print one copy of any publication from the public portal for the purpose of private study or research.
• You may not further distribute the material or use it for any profit-making activity or commercial gain
• You may freely distribute the URL identifying the publication in the public portal

Take down policy
If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.
Session: Junior Sociologists meet Senior Sociologists

Abstract

My PhD is designated to the didactics of social science education. I have a student centered view on education and learning in social science. I examine whether the concepts of alienation is useable in understanding active citizenship and its absence. In addition to this I keep an incredulous eye on if the active citizenship that is emphasized in the curriculum is desirable. Swedish education is known to let students influence their education in a quite large scale. Still our society has a modest level of activists and politically engaged citizens. Rather what we see is an “unconnectedness” with society, the society is regarded as "the other". I believe I can find signs of this unconnectedness within the empirical field of social science education in Swedish schools. I also strive to pinpoint some of the sources to this phenomenon. I will examine the privileged students such as above-average achievers. I see prosperous groups such as white, male and rich as an interesting focus since alienation theory mostly is used to describe those who define themselves as being outside of society, in school seen as skipping classes, failing tests, defying rules etc. Those groups are already examined and problematized in a large scale and I’m not sure that this has resulted in a better understanding of the alienation in form of unconnectedness to society that I am interested in. I think those "at the top" might be as alienated as those "on the bottom" – or even more so. And that this is a key to seeing a fuller picture. In other words: One of the sources of alienation might be the current power structure in society. I see it as troublesome to make the power structure visible without regarding those who limit the space for others to take place and act. Further on I also see a relevant aspect in examining middle-class categories of students, often seen as the “normal” student. I think alienation is a relevant force also in this context. Otherness is widely spread, as I see it, and in my view inequality can be understood through an alienation rooted in several areas.