Queer(ing) youth, schools, and the end of innocence. Problematizing understandings of non-heteronormative youth in schools

Schmitt, Irina

2009

Citation for published version (APA):

General rights
Copyright and moral rights for the publications made accessible in the public portal are retained by the authors and/or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

• Users may download and print one copy of any publication from the public portal for the purpose of private study or research.
• You may not further distribute the material or use it for any profit-making activity or commercial gain
• You may freely distribute the URL identifying the publication in the public portal

Take down policy
If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.
Schools are spaces of continuous ‘sex education’, marking all participants in the process of learning and teaching in highly gendered, sexed and sexualized – and classed and ethnicized – ways. Thinking of education about gender-sex-sexuality merely as knowledge that needs to be transmitted to students in an often limited classroom setting fails to notice the deeply rooted notions of subjectivity and belonging that enable and disable specifically gendered, sexed and sexualized positions. Transgression of gender-sex-sexuality norms, while tolerated to some extend as long as it is seen as ‘rebellion’, is severely punished when understood as serious negotiations of existing limitations. However, discourses of queer youth as victims underestimate both young people’s agency, their role as co-producers of belongings and hierarchizations, and the societal relevance of their experiences. The issue at stake is much broader than voicing concern about minoritized youth. Limiting our understanding of ‘youth’ as either innocent and impressionable or as in danger or endangering underestimates the relevance of young people’s negotiations of gender-sex-sexuality. Neither perspective challenges the fact that they are not full citizens. In a parallel, reading teachers’ roles as mere transmitters of knowledge both restricts their choices and limits their responsibilities.

With this paper, I will queerly investigate notions of ‘youth’ written into school policy documents and reflected in academic discourses on sex education and gender-sex-sexuality in schools.

Biography

Irina Schmitt is an ethnographer with expertise in youth, migration and gender research and works as a post-doctoral researcher at the Centre for Gender Studies at